A HEALTHY BUDGET FOR SENIORS

Older Australians have welcomed the extra $2.2 billion for healthcare announced in today's budget.

Commenting on the extra funding, National Seniors chief executive Michael O'Neill said:

“Over 50s spend more money on healthcare, have higher hospitalisation rates and are more likely to have long-term health conditions, so extra funding is always welcome.”

National Seniors, the nation's peak body for older Australians, has also given a cautious welcome to additional funding to tackle the skill shortage in age care, and measures to help older workers stay in the workforce.

Michael O'Neill said:

“The $103 million to help age care staff improve their skills is obviously welcome but it will not solve the longer-term problem of staff shortages, especially the shortage of nurses. We are concerned about what appears to be a piecemeal approach to the reform of age care.

“It is also welcome that the government has included mature aged workers in the $200 million package to help workers retrain and gain new skills, but more still needs to be done to help older workers who want to stay in the workforce.”
